A DECADE OF DARING

ASIAN UNIVERSITY FOR WOMEN

10th ANNIVERSARY REPORT

2008 - 2018

A LETTER FROM THE VICE CHANCELLOR

A Commitment to Excellence

Dear Friends,

We are delighted to have had yet another successful year, and it gives me great pleasure to share with you some of the developments of which we are most proud. This year's annual report illustrates our achievements and the University's commitment to excellence in education and scholarship. We have continued to attract outstanding students from across the region, representing over 17 countries. We have been more ambitious than ever in our local and regional outreach, and our flagship programme, Pathways for Promise, now has students drawn from the farthest parts of the region.

The University now has more than 800 students enrolled in its programmes. With an emphasis on critical thinking and problem-based learning, our programmes challenge our young women, equip them for their careers, and help to create the leaders of the future. Our mission informs everything we do and our aim is to deliver on our vision of developing lifelong leadership skills. We also share a set of values – empathy, integrity, courage and hope – that define the way we work and live.

After years of intensive effort, this year marks a turning point: the University is close to reaching the level of financial strength that will enable a step change in our ability to invest further in our academic mission. I am delighted to announce the establishment of endowed chairs in our key disciplines of public health, economics and computer sciences. The senior scholars, when appointed, will provide academic leadership, push the frontiers of the disciplines, and help recruit and retain the best faculty for the University.

These achievements are excellent for a University established just ten years ago and have only been made possible by sustained and high-quality commitment from staff and faculty across the University. I would like to add my thanks to all our colleagues for their hard work and enthusiasm in delivering this outstanding success.

The support and generosity of our international support foundations and philanthropy of other individuals and organisations have been integral to the continued success of our University, enabling us to grow in ways that would not otherwise be possible. We believe this is an exceptional place with an exceptional story to tell. And with an international network of partners, our impact is being felt all over the world. I am proud to lead a University which we firmly believe lives up to the ambitions of its founders to create an excellent place where talent, opportunities and knowledge converge at the service of students.

Sincerely,

We believe that empathy, courage, and outrage at injustice are key characteristics of leadership; so, too, are leading institutions made. In celebration of our 10th Anniversary, we explore how the AUW community has exemplified and cultivated these essential leadership qualities.

EMPATHY

The Power of Perspective

By Kathy Matsui, Vice Chair of Goldman Sachs Japan

It is too easy to forget in a world that values competition, drive, affluence and professional success, that there is vital social impact to cultivating empathy. It is also easy to forget why we have a responsibility to do so.

A good many talented, hardworking and even brilliant people, who could make important contributions to medicine, technology, politics and the arts, will never be able to do so because of a lack of access and opportunity. Their missed opportunities reflect a global situation that is still striving to create a fair playing field. Any one of us could have been one of them, had small changes in our history not come to pass. Any of our talents could have gone unnoticed, any of our successes could have been denied to us, simply because of the social and political situations into which we were born.

Empathy forces us to embrace personal humility by reminding us that our talents and drive may not have been enough to secure our success in the face of overwhelming challenges, but it also reminds us that our lone stories have a place in a world dominated by the voices of a small few. Each graduate of the Asian University for Women knows that her voice, her narrative, her story and the stories of her community, are a part of the Asian story and deserves to be heard. Each knows that her talents and intelligence deserve a chance to be on full display, and not silenced due to a labyrinth of social norms and economic climates hostile to her dreams.

“As students at the Asian University for Women often discover, empathy is hard work. We must learn to listen to others while learning to speak for ourselves, defend those whom we can and bear witness to the struggles of those whom we cannot.”

KATHY MATSUI is Vice Chair of Goldman Sachs Japan, co-head of Macro Research in Asia and chief Japan equity strategist. Ms. Matsui was chosen by the Wall Street Journal as one of the “10 Women to Watch in Asia” for her work on the “Womenomics” theme. She is a member of AUWSF’s Board of Directors.

As students at the Asian University for Women often discover, empathy is hard work. We must learn to listen to others while learning to speak for ourselves, defend those whom we can and bear witness to the struggles of those whom we cannot. It is a foundational value that honors both decency and memory. It creates the conditions for what some have called “the social bases of self-respect.”

Still, the hard work has a payoff. Empathy enables us to celebrate the rich diversity of a continent like Asia, where many languages, cultures, art forms and philosophies have created a tapestry of ideas that continues to guide our shared public discourse and inform our wisdom. We have a common inheritance in Asia that is all too often overshadowed by differences in religion, nation, ethnic group or social status. Cultivating empathy empowers us to gain insight into this shared inheritance and to participate in the common good of all societies.

“This is my first time staying with women from different cultures and nationalities. I have learned to be united. Though we are from different countries, we are like family.”

GLOBAL COMMUNITY: A Tribute to Partnerships

Hong Kong Support Foundation

Our university has been seeded and sustained by partners who believe in the importance of higher education for women and their communities. Our partners understand that while there are more girls completing primary and secondary education than ever before, women are often unable to advance to higher education as easily. Without higher education, they are less likely to progress to leadership roles. In these pages, we gratefully acknowledge those forward-thinking partners who have invested in women’s education at AUW - changing not only the lives of our students, but also the fates of their children, their communities, and the world.

Partnerships that Seed

AUW emerged from conversations with academics, government officials, and education experts that concluded that higher education, and the higher education of women in particular, is critical to promoting sustainable social, economic, and environmental development. Critical support from the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation and Open Society Foundation followed, leading the Parliament of Bangladesh to ratify the landmark Charter of the Asian University for Women in 2006, granting full institutional autonomy and academic freedom to AUW and cementing our unique status as an independent, international institution of higher learning in a region where such institutions are rare.

Partnerships that Sustain

Today, our community spans continents. Support Groups in Japan, Hong Kong, Singapore, and the UK sustain the AUW mission. Academic institutions such as Sciences Po, Johns Hopkins, and Harvard, among others, facilitate cross-cultural intellectual exchanges and collaboration.

Entrepreneurs, non-profits, and multinational corporations host student internships and post-graduate fellowships, providing crucial leadership experience for our students and alumnae. After ten years, we are indebted to this growing community that has, and will continue to, sustain AUW and its mission to cultivate the next generation of women leaders.

“Li & Fung and the Victor and William Fung Foundation are proud to support AUW students and to nurture these leaders of tomorrow. Over the past six years, we have benefited from having AUW students as interns. These young women see the world differently and have proven to be dynamic change-makers helping us unleash new ideas through their enthusiasm, versatility, and passion for making a difference.”

LOCAL IMPACT: AUW in the Community

As a major institution in the Chittagong area, AUW is an important partner in addressing regional and community needs. The University has robust relationships throughout Bangladesh, and actively engages with national and city leaders and neighbors on a variety of issues that address the mutual goal of improving the quality of life in Bangladesh. These strong, sustained partnerships have enriched public education and services, contributed to the local economy, and enhanced Bangladesh's global influence. Here we sit with Rubana Huq, Trustee of AUW and Managing Director of the Bangladesh-based Mohammadi Group, to hear her thoughts about the relationship between AUW and its host community.

How has AUW contributed to Bangladesh's society in awakening the potential of poor women to get the best education possible?

AUW challenges the notion that poor people from Asia should be given basic aid, but not something more transformative, such as a university education. In Bangladesh, specifically, AUW's Pathways for Promise program identifies talented individuals within under-resourced communities to attend AUW. These students become role models for women from similar backgrounds and men who may have higher aspirations for their daughters and sisters but are unsure of their options. By identifying talented women within communities that face stigma and cyclical poverty, AUW begins to eclipse mainstream perceptions of that community.

Additionally, many of AUW's highest leadership roles are held by Bangladeshi women who have attained their positions in society through higher education. The Chair of our Board of Trustees is Dr. Dipu Moni, who serves on the Parliamentary Standing Committee on the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Bangladesh; our Chief Patron is Sheikh Hasina, the Prime Minister of Bangladesh. These female leaders are vocal proponents of AUW's work and women's education, helping to change discouraging attitudes toward the impact of higher education for women—rich or poor.

How has AUW supported local community resources?

AUW consistently generates intellectual, professional, and financial resources for the local community. Students are socially-motivated hobbyists and spend a great amount of their extracurricular time 'giving back.' They start student clubs to nurture stray animals; launch social enterprises to tutor local school children; and, starting last year, are mandated to make at least five people literate by the time they graduate. AUW also employs a significant number of Bangladeshi nationals, both as staff and faculty. They are paid a fair and regular salary; provided benefits; and are part of a vibrant, international academic community.

About half of AUW's students come from various parts of Bangladesh and are likely to remain in the country upon graduation. In addition to working in and strengthening their local communities, alumnae also empower women back home to believe that they can achieve similar goals.

What are your hopes for the future of AUW, Bangladesh, and their relationship?

I hope AUW will be able to host more young women representing diverse groups from different countries, and sustain itself as an institution which provides opportunities for young women who dare to dream. I perceive that AUW is steadily shifting the narrative about women's ability to make meaningful contributions to both the public and private spheres of Bangladesh. It is my hope that this understanding continues to foster a more egalitarian nation. Strengthening Bangladesh helps to strengthen the Asian region as a whole.

Power of Global Collaboration

AUW's first ten years testifies to the power of global collaboration and partnership in engendering impact. By enacting the landmark Asian University for Women Act, 2006, the Parliament of Bangladesh created the essential framework for AUW's establishment and operation as an independent institution free from political or bureaucratic control. The land grant that came with the Charter provides it with the ground for building its own campus. An early challenge grant from the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation and additional support from the Open Society Foundation and others paved the way for its launch. The endorsement of key global figures such as Cherie Blair (UK), Laura Bush (USA) and Akie Abe (Japan) brought significant credibility and reach for the initiative. The collaboration agreements with the Governments of Afghanistan and Cambodia (and others) opened national channels for recruitment of students. NGO partners such as BRAC Afghanistan, the Grameen Bank, Taryana Foundation (Bhutan) and others helped leverage their extensive networks to highlight the opportunities at AUW. Public and private corporations and others hosted hundreds of AUW students as interns providing a key learning ground for professional engagement. Year after year talented educators from many parts of the world made Chittagong and AUW their home, creating a new ethos for a global learning community. A rising network of support groups in Japan, Hong Kong, Singapore, UK and the US mobilizing essential resources have helped sustain AUW's work. We also honor the confidence of parents who have trusted a new, international institution to contribute to the growth of their children. A common recognition of the urgency in and the possibility of educating a new generation of women leaders have brought countless individuals, groups and organizations together to make this difference. AUW could not come into being and exist today without its crucial partners.

2005: The Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation provides a challenge grant of US$15 million for AUW to begin operations.

2006: The Parliament of Bangladesh ratifies the Charter of Asian University for Women, guaranteeing full institutional autonomy and academic freedom to AUW.

2010: The Japan Support Group holds its first annual fundraising event.

2011: AUW holds a Foundation Stone Laying Ceremony in Chittagong, chaired by AUW Chancellor Cherie Blair and attended by Sheikh Hasina, Prime Minister of Bangladesh; Dr. Dipu Moni; Nurul Islam Nahid, Minister of Education; and Dr. Ngozi N. Okonjo-Iweala, then managing director of the World Bank.

COURAGE

“By empowering young women to clear the societal smoke that has darkened their horizons, AUW endeavors to disrupt regional assumptions about who women are and what they should become.”

TAWAKKOL KARMAN
2011 Nobel Peace Prize Winner

AUW and Change

By Tawakkol Karman

Despite the global challenges of mass migration, famine, and climate change that burden individuals and nations alike, we are in an era of ideas. Innovators who have chosen to resist ignorance and complicity present us with new solutions to protracted issues, and social leaders convince us of a better tomorrow.

In this context, Asian University for Women has emerged as a truly revolutionary approach to achieve equity, peace, and sustainable development through education. Tolstoy once claimed that “Everyone thinks of changing the world, but no one thinks of changing himself.” The AUW solution changes everything. By empowering young women to clear the societal smoke that has darkened their horizons, AUW endeavors to disrupt regional assumptions about who women are and what they should become. While spreading knowledge among women who have a hunger to lead and influence society, AUW addresses a regional epidemic that can only be described as a crisis: states that marginalize women and impose restrictions on their presence in the public sphere resign themselves to failure and make themselves vulnerable to extremism and violence.

AUW's commitment to making a significant contribution to women's scientific, cultural, economic, and political empowerment is a vital step towards overcoming regional policies that marginalize and weaken women. While everyone thinks of changing the world in which women live, AUW actually achieves this change through its generosity, commitment to excellence, and courage.

TAWAKKOL KARMAN is a Yemeni human rights activist, journalist, and politician. She was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 2011 in recognition of her work in non-violent struggle for freedom of expression, women's rights, and peacebuilding work in Yemen. She has been imprisoned on numerous occasions for her pro-democracy and pro-human rights protests. Among Yemen's youth movement, she is known as “mother of the revolution.” Tawakkol Karman was awarded a Doctorate in Humane Letters, honoris causa, by AUW at its 2018 Commencement.*

Achieving Excellence: Leaders in Liberal Arts and Sciences

Ask the right questions and do the right thing; at AUW, we prepare students to do both. We are reimagining liberal arts to meet the demands of a changing region in the digital age. We are fostering an intercultural residential campus where art, technology, and civic engagement permeate every room and corridor. Through an integrated common core curriculum and interdisciplinary majors spanning the humanities and sciences, we are equipping our future leaders – women – with the broad knowledge and technical skills they need to question assumptions and change the world.

At the heart of this academic enterprise is our faculty. They lead AUW by taking seriously their roles as educator, mentor, advocate, and friend; by modelling compassion and constructive criticality in their teaching and research; and by giving everything they have to support our students and those who are counting on our students to lead. They hold Ph.D. qualifications from top institutions including Harvard, Oxford, and the London School of Economics. They represent myriad nationalities and research specialties; half are women.

What do the great liberal arts institutions of the world have to learn from AUW?

“One of the things that is happening in older liberal arts universities, and one of the reasons why I left these liberal arts institutions, is that they’re becoming more and more elite enterprises, educating people who can afford to pay for them. That is not, for me, what college is supposed to be about. University is supposed to be about finding bright and gifted people from all sorts of backgrounds and figuring out how to get them into places where they can affect policy, governance structures, and other people’s lives in a more meaningful way. And fortunately, you find that in AUW.”

Reflections on Teaching

“The atmosphere of AUW is one of high energy, innovation and drive. I’ve often felt a strong entrepreneurial spirit amongst staff and students and a very real sense underlying the daily activities that we are all committed to a truly meaningful cause. This sense of energy and commitment is reflected in the number of community outreach initiatives, cultural festivals and social enterprises that students develop on their own, and the leadership roles that students take on through internships and summer projects.

“It can also be felt in the classroom space. It is very rare to teach in an institution where students are so earnest and eager to learn, consistently striving to better themselves and their knowledge of the world. Their curiosity, coupled with the extraordinary cultural diversity in the classroom, also consistently challenges you as faculty to be critical and self-reflexive in your teaching and in your research.

“Specifically, after coming to AUW I became very motivated to conduct research projects that engage with tangible real-world concerns. I wanted to be able to respond meaningfully to the very real, profound and pragmatic anxieties and challenges faced by the community in front of me. This is a shift in research focus that will stay with me into the future.”

TIFFANY CONE

Assistant Professor of Cultural Anthropology

“The liberal arts pedagogy takes place in a smaller classroom setting with more interactive teaching and learning. Students and faculty are more engaged not just inside the class, but also outside the class. And AUW takes this to a different level.”

725+ summer internships completed

2008: The first cohort of A UW students arrives on campus to attend Access Academy. The inaugural cohort consists of 130 young women from six countries: Bangladesh, Cambodia, India, Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka.

2009: Distinguished academics and advisors establish the liberal arts curriculum of the Undergraduate Program.

2010: A workshop titled "Understanding of the Ethnic Conflict in Sri Lanka" is held for 25 students from Sri Lanka, which built awareness of the history and causes of the Tamil-Sinhalese conflict.

700+ graduates

800+ current students

25+ languages spoken

35+ ethnicities

Students from 17 countries in Asia and Middle East

By equipping women with the tools to achieve change in their communities, an investment in AUW yields social returns well beyond the impact of one young woman's education. Such an investment is felt in the halls of government in nations where women have historically been deprived a voice, in the boardrooms of multinational companies that have been male-dominated for decades, and in communities that have been stuck in the rut of poverty for generations.

2012: AUW realizes its first full complement of classes - a total student body of 535, with cohorts in the Access Academy and each Undergraduate year.

2013: The University graduates its first cohort of students.

2016: AUW launches Pathways for Promise to increase its recruitment of students from marginalized populations including garment factory workers, Rohingya refugees, and women from the hill tribes of India and Myanmar.

STORIES OF IMPACT

“I work on projects related to gender equality and the needs of women with disabilities.”

As an intern at UN Women in New York City, I researched South-South cooperation and its role in the development of Asian countries. I also worked on projects related to gender equality and the needs of women with disabilities. This experience prepared me for a career in my home country, Afghanistan, where several decades of war have left many women and children disabled and with few personal or professional opportunities. After the internship, I returned to Kabul to complete a post-graduate fellowship with a non-profit social services organization.

“I used media, journalism, and documentary filmmaking to affect attitudes about the role of women in peacebuilding processes.”

After taking political science courses throughout my interdisciplinary degree in A UW, I’ve reached the conclusion that not letting people express themselves freely and preventing their political and social participation is one of the major causes of conflict and war. One cannot bring change without being able to state his or her opinions on matters of social concern, and my society needs to change attitudes about the role of women in peacebuilding and democracy.

In the Spring of 2018, I started my work in the Yala Academy’s Aileen Getty School of Citizen Journalism. Throughout the course, I discovered that pluralistic and free mass media can be a powerful and far-reaching tool to advance peace, justice, conflict resolution, democracy, freedom, and women’s participation in society. I used media, journalism, and documentary filmmaking to affect attitudes about the role of women in peacebuilding processes. I told the stories of emerging women leaders from seven different countries and their impact on their communities.

I have always valued and admired the effect of independent media in the democratization process and peace negotiations. After graduation, I want to contribute to peacebuilding activities by becoming involved in media and journalistic enterprises. I want to continue my work as a storyteller and documentary filmmaker to challenge the status quo and promote mutual understanding and coexistence within my community and beyond.

As a Research Assistant for Translators Without Borders (TWB), I work to ensure that Rohingya women are heard and understood by those who help to support the Rohingya community. Using my knowledge and language skills, I frequently discuss challenges pertaining to women’s health and gender-based violence. My main responsibility is to help TWB identify the words related to emotions, health, gender-based violence, and protection that are easily understood by Rohingya refugees in Cox’s Bazar. TWB will include these words in their multilingual glossary web app.

“I had the honor of meeting Hazera Begum, a former sex-worker.”

In Bangladesh, children of sex workers are often left out of public campaigns to bring underprivileged students to school. Without education, these children can never break out from the invisible chains of the brothel in which they were born.

Last December, I had the honor of meeting Hazera Begum, a former sex-worker. Today, Hazera Begum is dedicated to giving children of sex-workers a better life. She has taken 42 children under her wing. Although she struggles to feed them, you will not find a single child of age who does not go to school. All of Hazera Begum’s adopted children are studying in different schools, and she is never tired of caring for them.

Nevertheless, keeping everyone fed at home and enrolled in school is not easy. Listening to Hazera Begum’s powerful story, I decided to make a short film about her as an attempt to bring her story to this world. While interviewing her, the strength of her voice motivated me to move forward and join her cause. Hazera Begum’s story made me wonder: Like Hazera Begum, would I have the courage to take on the responsibility of raising these children alone? Would anyone?

At that moment, it was more than a film to me. I really wanted to do something for Hazera Begum and her children. Thankfully, my film received an overwhelmingly positive response and won first place at the ConnectHer film competition. Later, ConnectHer decided to financially support Hazera Begum, and we were able to co-initiate a project to support the education of Hazera Begum’s adopted daughters.

As we became more involved with Hazera Begum, we decided to gather more support for her children. These children have just as much a right to education as other Bangladeshi children, and as this project continues, we aim to keep these children in school and provide as much support as required to give them an equal chance to thrive with the other kids of their age.

OUTRAGE AT INJUSTICE

Stepping Up to Social Reform

By Christina Tamang, Nepal, Class of 2017

After graduating with a Biology degree from AUW, I returned to my community to start a career in science. However, as I readjusted to life in the Nepalese community, I felt increasingly more uncomfortable with the way my society discriminates against people on the basis of their caste, class, and gender. This discrimination affects individuals' employment, education, and inheritance rights, but gender discrimination in particular leads to the exploitation and trafficking of vulnerable girls.

"In Nepal, one girl is trafficked every hour. The notion that women are inferior to men, or that women are merely objects of male satisfaction, has given men an implicit license to take advantage of women in my country."

CHRISTINA TAMANG

In Nepal, one girl is trafficked every hour. The notion that women are inferior to men, or that women are merely objects of male satisfaction, has given men an implicit license to take advantage of women in my country. Nepal's patriarchal society values sons as assets and negates daughters as liabilities, leading to discriminatory attitudes and behaviors. As a result, girls have fewer chances to access education and employment opportunities. Due to financial insecurity and social vulnerability, many Nepalese girls are lured into the trafficking trade. Most come from poor families in indigenous, lower caste, and minority groups.

Unable to accept such norms, I chose to work for social reform. Through my first job at Steps Foundation Nepal, I developed workshops for women to identify their strength and dignity and to mitigate stigma against menstruation in my village. Later I joined Nepal Jesuit Social Institute (NJSI), which supports infrastructure projects and vocational and empowerment training for disadvantaged people in 11 districts of Nepal. Recently, I initiated a partnership project between AUW and NJSI to identify 15 high-potential young women from highly trafficked regions of Nepal for admission to AUW with full scholarship support. As an AUW graduate, I am optimistic that the education and opportunities at AUW will equip these women with skills they need to fight trafficking in their communities. Having closely experienced the methods and consequences of trafficking, these women will be able to transform and channel their outrage into a movement to eradicate trafficking at its roots.

2008: AUW introduces Access Academy, a revolutionary, pre-university bridge program equipped to introduce students to the liberal arts curriculum.

2012: AUW begins to build relationships with Rohingya leaders in Myanmar with the hope of recruiting Rohingya students.

2014: Access Academy students begin to teach English to Bangladeshi street children as part of their service requirement.

2016: Pathways for Promise is launched as a recruitment-based program targeting the most marginalized populations in Asia.

2016: The first cohort of garment workers enter into Pathways for Promise. Over 1,000 garments workers apply and 68 women enroll.

2017: AUW begins plans for recruitment of tea plantation workers in Assam, India and Sri Lanka.

2018: AUW holds admissions tests for women studying in Madrasas. Over 300 eager young women sit for the entrance exams.

Education is a human right.
Its absence is an injustice.

Education makes a difference - in the life of a person, their family, and their community. It affords myriad opportunities - from labor market success to preparation for democratic citizenship and personal fulfillment. As the greatest equalizer, educational opportunities should not be allotted on the basis of arbitrary circumstances such as a person's gender, ethnic background, or socio-economic status at birth.

But what does “equality of education” look like on the ground? How can institutions make high-quality education accessible to women from the hardest to reach areas of Asia?

Since 2008, our response has been threefold: revolutionize the university admissions process, transform the region's standard university curriculum, and invest heavily in financial aid. We actively seek students from communities that are difficult to reach by conventional means of travel and communication. From daughters of microfinance borrowers and garment factory and tea estate workers to Rohingya refugees; madrasa students; and women from the hill tribes of Bangladesh, India, and Myanmar, we work with community leaders to establish trust and ensure that our programs are relevant to their local context. We offer admissions exams and interviews in the students' native languages to ensure that English is not a barrier to entry. And we seek indicators of leadership potential, such as courage, empathy, and outrage at injustice, that predict success better than any exam ever could.

Once our students are admitted, we enroll them in academic programs called Access Academy and Pathways for Promise, as needed, to ensure that disruptions in their primary and secondary education - such as forced displacement or extreme poverty - do not preclude them from succeeding in our English-medium liberal arts and sciences undergraduate program. Supported by scholarships, they are free to learn without the shame of being who they are, achieving their wildest dreams. This is equity in action and it anchors everything we do.

PATHWAYS FOR PROMISE: Fighting Injustice Through Education

As a pre-university preparatory program that focuses on academic skills building, Pathways for Promise provides a bridge for highly-talented young women to claim the education that is well within their right but not within their means. This program employs targeted recruitment in the most marginalized communities and equips its students with the English-language and learning skills needed to flourish in our Undergraduate Program.

Tea Garden Girls Turn a New Leaf

On most tea gardens in India and Sri Lanka, tea pluckers and their family members live in dormitories near the garden. Space is crowded, sanitation is poor, and opportunities are few and far between. The eldest of three children, Pollovi Das Panika grew up on the Hokunguri tea gardens in Upper Assam, India, where her father works. This particular tea garden sources leaves for Typhoo Tea, the UK’s third largest tea brand. Pollovi was able to attend a school run by the tea garden for secondary education but knew her options would be limited afterwards due to financial constraints. After taking the AUW entrance exam on the garden and earning a full scholarship, that financial barrier was entirely lifted and Pollovi’s intellectual potential was free to flourish at AUW. “I feel like everything is possible now,” Pollovi says.

Beyond the Factory Floor

In Bangladesh, poor families often turn their daughters to early marriage when finances are tight; studies show that about 65% of Bangladeshi girls are married before the age of 18. Sometimes, employment is a preferred alternative to early marriage for young women - even if the job has issues of its own. When Rubina Yeasmin was 13, her father’s sudden death prompted others to encourage her to leave school and get married to lighten her family’s financial burden. But Rubina fought back-- she finished her high school education and moved to Dhaka upon graduating to work as a quality control inspector in a garment factory. Although the factory’s minimum wage was barely enough to support herself, Rubina worked overtime to send money home, allowing her younger brother to go to school. When AUW came to her factory with the opportunity to apply for full scholarships, Rubina was the first to raise her hand. “I never imagined this could happen to someone like me,” she says. “It’s a dream come true.”

Finding Refuge in Higher Education

Today, over one million Rohingya remain displaced between Myanmar and Bangladesh. The Rohingya are a Muslim ethnic minority group that has been living primarily in Myanmar’s Rakhine State for generations. The Government of Myanmar considers them illegal immigrants and stripped them of citizenship in 1982. Since then, Rohingyas’ experiences of neglect and human rights abuses have escalated significantly. When unrest broke out in Formin Akter’s remote village of Rakhine State, she and her friends walked for four days and four nights through dense jungles and mountains to seek refuge in Bangladesh. If it rained, there was no other option than to be drenched. If there was food, it was shared; if there was not, they starved. Formin was frequently vulnerable to theft and sexual assault. Along the journey, Formin saw villages burned to the ground, distinguishable only by the remains of homes. She watched bullets fly through the air, some making lethal contact with their target, others narrowly missing. After days of walking, Formin finally reached the Naf River and boarded a crowded boat that would take her to the refugee camps in Bangladesh. Now 18-years-old, Formin believes that she can achieve her dreams at AUW. “I feel like I am riding my way to success,” she says. “There will be no looking back now.”

ACCESS ACADEMY: From Rote Learning to Critical Thinking

Access Academy is an essential step in our approach to creating leaders. Access Academy molds orators, team players, and critical thinkers. It teaches students how to learn and question assumptions. Through cultural programs, discussion-based courses, and a residential campus, students learn what it means to be a compassionate and engaged member of an international community. Students master academic writing in English, practice skills in quantitative reasoning, become competent in use of computers, and gain an understanding of world history. Additionally, Access Academy teaches martial arts lessons, ensuring that students become empowered in both mind and body. Access Academy teaches the qualities that are essential for the future leaders of our world.

SUSTAINABILITY

single community – it can get overwhelmed by all the other problems on the list: poverty, disease, violence, sanitation, and climate change. We need something to treat these problems across the board – a silver bullet. For me and many others, that silver bullet is women’s education.”

JACK MEYER

Senior Managing Partner & CEO of Convexity Capital Management

Co-Founder of AUW

Chairman Emeritus of AUW Support Foundation

An investment in AUW is the best use of a philanthropic dollar. By investing in the education of women who live in the margins of society, we leverage their resilience, local knowledge, and outrage at injustice to solve a range of interconnected global issues, extending from hunger, health, inequality, and unemployment to economic stagnation, poor governance, and climate change. We improve their life outcomes and those of their families. We prepare them to lead fulfilling lives and to participate more fully in their communities.

Since 2008, our partners have supported AUW because this model of sustainable development works. Our partners have championed student and faculty recruitment, academic and leadership program development, and fundraising. Through their example, they have inspired the next generation of global leaders to outthink, out care, and outwork the status quo.

As we enter our second decade, we will continue to be bold. We will expand enrollment to 3000 students, invest heavily in science programs, and establish a lab school and graduate programs. To sustain this growth, we will construct our permanent campus, grow our endowment, and enroll students from all strata of society. Because AUW has always been a community effort, we will continue to engage partners who exemplify the ethical and innovative leadership that we seek to instill in our students – the kind of leadership that our world so desperately needs.

"I no longer think just for myself, I think for my community and society."

GOVERNANCE

Asian University for Women is governed by its Board of Trustees in accordance with the Charter of the University. The Board of Trustees bears the ultimate responsibility, fiduciary and otherwise, for the University's policies, programs and other activities. AUW is supported by a Council of Patrons who serve as public advocates for the institution. The University relies on a number of independently constituted but affiliated support foundations or groups incorporated in different jurisdictions to mobilize financial resources for it. An International Council of Advisors, chaired by the Nobel Physics Laureate Professor Jerome Friedman, provides counsel to the university on a variety of matters important in the life of the University. A Bangladesh Board of Advisors chaired by the Foreign Minister and composed of other senior Government representatives and civic and academic leaders help support the Vice Chancellor's agenda for institutional development.

HOPE

KAMAL AHMAD

Founder of Asian University for Women
CEO of Asian University for Women
Support Foundation

More than ten years have passed since March of 2008 when AUW started its journey of educating young women from across Asia and the Middle East. We set out to do what no one in the region had ever tried: create a liberal arts university of high standards that strives, in particular, to educate women from some of the most challenging backgrounds in the world. The task became even larger as we located AUW in a setting where an institution of its type was clearly needed but which remained hobbled by pervasive poverty, limited human resources and inadequate physical infrastructure. To operate effectively, AUW, in effect, had to create its own “city” with its own back-up utilities, security and health care. Although we started out with an enormous amount of goodwill and very generous seed supporters, there was no single benefactor who guaranteed the financial demands of an institution serving largely students who needed full aid.

Ten years on, we have graduated 750 women from 15 countries, most of whom are first in their family to enter university; our enrollment has increased from 130 from six countries to 800 in 2018 from 17 countries. We have gone deeper and farther in the last mile of human geography to find our extraordinary students. Our graduates have broken endless barriers to successfully enter careers in journalism, human rights advocacy, banking and civil service in Kabul or Herat or Jaffna or Thimphu or Phnom Penn or Cox’s Bazar, start their own enterprises, and enter into some of the most prestigious graduate programs around the world. Most significantly, our graduates and students have lighted a beacon of hope that is bound to stir every girl or young woman who faces opposition to her right to equal treatment. Our academic leaders and faculty have enthusiastically taught a student body like no other, both in their demands for learning as well as in the well of inspiration that they carry. Our Chancellor, our boards and other supporters hailing from many far-flung places have rarely let up even in the wake of our failures to meet expectations at times. Our host country, Bangladesh, and all its political and civic leaders, have unfailingly supported AUW. To all of them, AUW is deeply grateful.

As we look to our next decade, we will pursue six objectives: (i) we will continue to improve the quality of our academic programs through recruiting the most talented faculty and enhancing our learning and teaching practices; (ii) we will establish graduate professional programs in education; leadership & management; and environmental engineering; (iii) we will build out our academic and residential facilities (with all the requisite technological access) for at least 3000 students; (iv) we will deepen our ability to identify and recruit women from communities that suffer systemic injustice; (v) we will strive to ensure AUW’s financial sustainability; and (vi) we will create and support an effective platform for AUW graduates to launch into their careers and other ambitions.

We hope in the ensuing years AUW will be the most desired higher education destination for young women from across Asia who have the talents and the commitment to change their societies. It is a tall order but we are confident that, with your support, we can achieve our goals.

Sincerely,

Kamal Ahmad

AUW in the Media

"There was such a dramatic change in the status of women in Bangladesh...that it was ripe for the Asian University for Women. Women could not afford to stay veiled up at home. They responded to every chance." (Kamal Ahmad) -- "The Education of Kamal Ahmad," The Boston Globe, 2008

"Stepping into the university lets a person visit 'a dozen different countries all at once,' said Chogyel Wangmo, one of the 23 students from the mountain kingdom of Bhutan. "There are no prejudices, no assumptions." -- "Deprived, but Full of Determination," The New York Times, 2012

"She could not imagine her situation improving, until she was called to a meeting at the factory and learned of a scheme -- the first of its kind-- launched by the Asian University for Women to provide free university education to women working in Bangladesh's garment factories." -- "Dresses to Degrees: University Opens its Doors to Bangladesh Garment Workers," The Guardian, 2016

"The university has spent years working to gain the trust of the community's leaders, and Rohingya women now make up just under 10 per cent of AUW's student body." -- "Asian University for Women Helping Rohingya Refugees Into Higher Education as it Marks its 10th Anniversary," The South China Morning Post, 2018

Across Asian cultures, the lotus has come to symbolize enlightenment and rebirth. Native to the deep, muddy rivers of South Asia, the lotus blooms to beauty each night, unscathed by its harsh environment. We hold the lotus as a symbol of the potential in our students, and the growth that we hope to cultivate in them, regardless of the challenging waters from which they may come.
